

NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE, THURSDAY, JANUARY 6, 1853.

work was to be finished by October, 1846, and O'Donnell was to receive payment as money was collected on assessments. In November, 1847, a resolution was introduced into the Common Council deciding that O'Donnell was not going on with the work, and directing the Street Commissioner to notify him that unless he proceeded with it new proposals would be made. This resolution was referred to the Street Committee, who reported that they had made arrangements with O'Donnell to continue the contract, on condition that he be paid 6 cents per load, and 18 cents per cubic foot, on work already done. The recommendation of the Committee was adopted, but payment was refused on the ground that the job had not been finished within the period stipulated, although the contract had been awarded to another person. Judge Greenwood, whose opinion reviewing the case in all its bearings, decided that the plaintiff was entitled to the whole amount claimed, $1,875 less 12, less $100 25 allowed on assessments.
